SYNOPSIS

Farha is a 14 year old girl who lives in a small village in Palestine, 1948. Girls her age are traditionally married off or spoken for yet Farha wants to continue her education despite traditions and the restrictions of schooling in her village for boys only. Inseparable from her best friend Farida, who lives in the city but who spends weekends in the village, Farha dreams of joining her at a school in the city. Life in the village is threatened and aggressively changed by the looming danger. Just when Farha's father is finally convinced and Farha's dream is at last coming true, the danger comes closer to their village. As violence escalates, Farha is brutally separated from Farida. Terrorized for his daughter's safety and fearing for her life, Farha's father locks her up in a concealed, small food storage space by the house, promising to return. But he never does.

Over the course of the next few days, Farha undergoes a life-changing experience while buried in the tight dark space, her only connection to the outside world is a small hole in the wall and a few cracks in the wooden door. Farha witnesses a lot of events, outside and inside the room, setting off her journey of transformation and forcing her to grow up and leave her childhood behind.

DIRECTOR STATEMENT

Like many Jordanians with Palestinian roots, I exist today because my father was one of the people who survived the events of Al-Nakba (the Catastrophe) in 1948. Sadly however, many Palestinians did not survive and those who did were never able to return to their homes. I grew up listening to many stories about life back then. One of them, shared by my Syrian mother who met the real character after she made it to Syria, struck a chord with me: a young girl who was locked up by her father in a pantry fearing for her life and family honor when the violent events started in Palestine 1948, promising her to come back, but he never does. I couldn't take that girl out of my mind, I kept thinking of how she felt in this small dark room, especially because I have a fear of tight and dark places. Over the years, all these stories, people, their lives, happy and sad moments in history came together in my mind, slowly forming the story of FARHA. I didn't want to treat Farha as just a number, one of the 700,000 that were forced into exile, I wanted to focus on her personal journey and dreams that changed from fighting to learn, to fighting to survive, always keeping the war in the background. It's a story about friendship, aspiration, separation, rite of passage, survival and liberation in the face of loss. All seen through the eyes of 14-year-old, Farha. Any time I thought of her a feeling of suffocation would come over me. The urge to share her story and journey continued to grow. I wanted to convey this feeling to the audience to allow them to go through this journey with FARHA. This is why I had the majority of the film take place inside a small, confined space where the only connection to the outside world is a high hole in the wall and later on some cracks in the wooden door, and I chose to keep the camera inside with FARHA as we never leave this room for approximately 50 minutes of the film to experience Farha's hopes, fears and transformation, to witness first hand her coming of age. I was attracted to that challenging setup and I always knew the coloring and sound design would be major components for realizing my vision. This is why they were incorporated in the script early on before shooting, to help deliver the different emotions Farha goes through and the contrast between the different acts of the film. But also, especially in the dark pantry where some moments rely completely on sound. Directing actors is essential for me. I chose a non-actress to embody Farha through her emotional journey as I believe there is something beautifully raw about non-actors, especially the young, where you can shape them into characters. During our acting workshops I always maintained a fine line between coaching her and keeping something fresh for filming. Leaving her childhood behind and in spite of Farha's many losses, her liberation from her prison is the ultimate win. She is reborn.

“This girl’s harsh experience travelled over the years to reach me, now it is time to share it with you”
Darin J. Sallam

“That remarkable setup struck a chord inside of me, and FARHA started to emerge. She stayed in my mind, I kept thinking of how she felt in this small dark room, especially that I have the same fear of the dark and tight places. A feeling of suffocation invaded me every time I remembered her. The urge to share her journey kept growing within me, gradually forming the story of FARHA.”
